

Helix new Waxflower releases

Whilst displaying a range of white and pink flowering tones, the three new Waxflower hybrids have been selected for their compact form.

"Our early Waxflower releases have mainly come from our cut flower development programme where the selection criteria is very focussed on long stems and high stem yield per plant," said Adrian Parsons, Managing Director, Helix Australia.

"Now with the growing interest in Waxflower for native garden use we are now working hard on selecting hybrid forms which work better in a suburban garden environment, also suitable for rockery and small hedge application," he said.

"In addition, the more compact Waxflower forms present a much better shape in a pot for retail sale," said Parsons. 🌱
